Q: "Many" and "lot of" with adjectives and numbers I just asked a question about a movie, and the poster commented, "I thought that it was many mistakes, but in fact it was lot of mistakes." I thought I'd keep a record, but apparently all my previous questions are incorrect. What's the correct meaning of "many" and "lot of" in this context? A: He was not speaking literally, but figuratively. Much and lots of are idioms that are used to express the quantity of something. While they do express the same thought, they have slightly different connotations. Much means that the quantity of something is large. "The wine was very much diluted"; "...that much is confirmed." As an aside, "much" is also used to express the importance of something. "The French have much to thank Elizabeth for"; "Her great name will endure many a year". A lot of means that the quantity is large. "She is the mother of many children." The two can be used in the same way, but they can be used to express different quantities. "I am very much afraid of that many-headed dragon." "Till they reached the hill, they met a great many people going the same way." 570a42141b
