Early functional prostheses were primarily intended for amputees who required splint-like devices to stabilize the foot or ankle in a particular position. More recently, passive devices have also been designed to provide support to a person's foot and/or ankle to improve balance and/or comfort when the person is not walking. These passive devices, such as ankle foot orthoses, are typically bulky and uncomfortable, and are difficult and/or impractical for users to wear. To address the need for ankle foot orthoses that are more comfortable, there have been several attempts to produce ankle foot orthoses that have spring elements incorporated into them. Examples of devices of this type can be found in U.S. Pat. Nos. 5,032,095; 5,165
