Occupational exposure to low and trace concentrations of hexavalent chromium: a multi-dosing study using human volunteers. Occupational exposure to hexavalent chromium (Cr(6+)) is known to elicit a risk of lung and skin cancers. The mechanism of action of Cr(6+) remains to be fully elucidated, but the results of the many experimental studies suggest that it acts as a clastogenic and mutagenic agent and as a cause of oxidative stress. On the basis of several experimental studies, the limit for Cr(6+) exposure in occupational settings has been set by the International Agency for Research on Cancer at 25 microg/m(3) for an 8-h time-weighted average. The use of non-human animals for deriving acute and chronic exposure limits is not considered a suitable approach because of the methodological difficulties and the high cost. As an alternative, the results of human epidemiological studies that have investigated the effects of exposure to relatively low and trace concentrations of Cr(6+) are summarized. The available data indicate that cumulative exposure to low concentrations of Cr(6+) for a prolonged period of time may be associated with effects on several biological systems, including the immune and reproductive systems and, possibly, the skin. The use of such low concentrations of Cr(6+)
