Bipolar disorder and autism are two childhood-onset neuropsychiatric disorders with significant public health implications. Previous research indicates abnormalities in social and communicative behavior in children and adolescents with bipolar disorder. The etiology of autism is unclear, but a model that involves damage to specific brain regions during development is frequently used to explain some of the behavioral phenotypes associated with autism. The aim of the present investigation was to determine whether early exposure to either carbamazepine or phenytoin affects social behavior in rats. The first objective of this study was to develop a rat model that can be used to study the effects of early exposure to drugs that influence social behavior. Bilateral brain lesions were produced in rat pups by the injection of the toxin ibotenic acid at postnatal day 3. This model was used in subsequent experiments. The second objective was to examine the effects of early treatment with carbamazepine or phenytoin on
