San Francisco city leaders have asked the U.S. Patent and Trademark Office to limit the number of patents in the city and its surrounding area. The proposed limits, which will still be published in the next few weeks, attempt to balance the effect of patents on existing businesses with the effect they have on startups. It would also allow San Francisco to license patents in the city and surrounding area to startups rather than companies. San Francisco already has more patent applications than any other U.S. city, but they mostly go to large companies that have existing operations in the city, according to the San Francisco Municipal Transportation Agency. Proponents of the limits believe the proposed measures will benefit San Francisco's tech industry by giving new companies a leg up, by encouraging startups to come into the city. "We think that these changes will benefit our city by encouraging the city's young companies to flourish and grow," wrote SFMTA's Director
