In a comment in the comments-section of an earlier entry, Herbert Jackson provided a detailed entry of his UK/USA Cliché: "I am going to award the prize to the biggest difference between "The USA" and "The UK", or "Americans" and "Britishers", or something similarly generalized and vague." I'm going to call this the "Least Personally Offensive Contest" and since so many have entered, it will be rather interesting. I think we should play a little game to bring out the contest and to see who can be the most politically correct; I am sure there will be many entries. I do not think this is something I should mention before the first entry comes in, so here it is, the rules: The One Minute Cliché contest rules: You must mention a phrase, word or expression that is commonly used in the USA and the UK, but is very offensive in the UK. You should encourage others to make this (and other) entries, as long as they are not overtly offensive. Please include the word "one minute" in your text, as without that everyone will have a "one minute" to reply. Please submit this as an entry by 18:00 on

Many thanks to Frank for having me back on. I'd mentioned how I'd needed a break from commissioning the plays on Fresh Air and to get back to me. The guy who said that wasn't "So and So", the host of my show, it's Guy de las Cases so lets call him "GdC". I get a phone call from him to say he'd recorded me and my guest last week. I hadn't heard it so I asked where it was and if he needed me to listen and he said he'd recorded it on his PC, so I'd get it. Obviously my better half, Claire, hadn't listened to it yet. She didn't hear it till I'd listened to it and the comments I'd made when I'd heard it and it wasn't nice enough to put me off. I wanted to get on the bus home and tear into him so I can be off the radio but as we both know, I couldn't do that as I'd just put it on the air. I did ask him to edit it down and shorten it but he told me "Let's leave it". I was basically saying that there were people out there who wanted to hear my comments on what I'd said and how it was clearly blowing up on Twitter so it was a shame that he was cutting it down. He actually told me to say it because he thought it was going to put him into a rage. He went on to say that his feeling that day was that the ratings had gone into free fall and that he was leaving it alone to look at the data.

It's been a long time coming, but the official release date for Battlefield 4 has finally been revealed. The title will make its worldwide debut on the PC, PS3 and Xbox 360 on October 29th, a mere two weeks from today. Before then, however, the military shooter sequel will be available through EA Access from October 20th in the Xbox 360 Preview Edition, and October 23rd on the PS3 and PC. EA Access is a service that includes access to five full games, including Battlefield 4, FIFA 13, FIFA 14 and Plants vs. Zombies: Garden Warfare. For the $5 a month fee, you get to play the games a couple of days early, as well as participate in all of the improvements found in full releases, like season passes, and ongoing live Q&A sessions
