Search in Zip-Files Reviews: ReviewsPhysical, chemical, and clinical properties of Chlorella yokogawae C. I. algal culture. The physical, chemical, and clinical properties of Chlorella yokogawae C. I. algal culture were investigated. The algal cells, grown in a normal photoperiod and temperature (22 degrees C), were subcultured for four generations in the dark, at 8 degrees C. In the third generation of the photoperiod and temperature dark conditions, the ratio of chlorophyll a/b was 5.07, and the growth rate of the dry cell mass and the nutrient concentration in the culture medium were 2.34 g/l/day and 2.86 mg/l, respectively. After four generations of culturing, the number of cells was $3.17 \times 10(6)$ ml(-1), and the protein, lipid, glucose, and nitrogenous matter concentrations were 0.13, 7.79, 18.38, and 0.43%, respectively. The mean diameter of the algal cells was 1.1 microm, and the single-layer cell wall contained mainly glycoprotein and glycolipid, but no glucosamine. The pH and oxidation-reduction potential were 8.15 and -234 mV, respectively. It was clear that the culture medium of Chlorella yokogawae was not the medium used to grow the alga.Gone from us, as the years roll by, are those countless moments, beyond our present scope of ken, when we were lucky enough to witness some devastating natural phenomenon while it was still unfolding: the first light of dawn and the last gleam of twilight at the same instant, the rising and setting of the moon, the sudden clouding of the air with glowing pollen, the procession of milky way on a summer night. The list of shocking phenomena is long. But not, I think, so long as to have left behind an equally engrossing sub-species of the species of
