My name is Tom Tippins. And we have two stories for you today: Number 1 is from the Bureau of Economic Analysis, which says that the economy created 71,000 private sector jobs last month, while the government reduced employment by 20,000. But when you look a bit closer you find that the net increase in employment was a mere 11,000. What are we to make of that? Economic historian Barry Eichengreen has a theory

Greece's history is characterized by the inevitable coexistence of things, people and spaces that are based on what has been. The Cretan tile-houses (kalivia), the Negroponte dome-houses (Agora) and the Kerameikos slums are the perennial elements that attest to that coexistence. The type of housing that, in the face of an acute housing shortage and an almost-total lack of planning, was devised and built from scratch by thousands of poor Athenians in the so-called Kerameikos area. The word eidos, in the Greek language, means both the type and the essential characteristics of a thing. It is used to denote the subjective essence of something, as opposed to the physical object. In modern Greek, this word is synonymous to ethos. Since the dawn of time, people have tried to come up with a solution for the housing shortage. In the ancient world, the most common solution adopted was to construct a village for thousands of people in one area, where they could build a single dwelling for each family. The first such villages, such as Sparta, were conceived as a solution for the plight of war-weary men, permanently excluded from their homes. The Kerameikos slums, or Kera, originated as a military area, selected because it was flat, and because it commanded a good view over the city
