Watch Abar Byomkesh (2012) 720p HD Bengali Movie .Ninth Circuit upholds admission of photostat because defendant cannot show chain of custody and so, no constitutional violation. In State v. Ojeda [27-36883]{27.1} (hereafter Ojeda) the Supreme Court of California upheld the admission of a certified copy of a judgment of a foreign court. In so doing, it cited to several earlier cases where courts admitted the same judgment. In so doing, it gave meaning to the Constitution's reasonable-doubt standard of proof. In Ojeda, the court held that the judgment was admissible as long as the certified copy was properly authenticated. In this case, on the other hand, a Florida court issued a contempt order against a lawyer. In subsequent proceedings, a Florida court admitted as a court record a certified copy of the finding that found the lawyer to be in contempt. Also, a Nevada court admitted a certified copy of a judgment of a California court with regard to a Florida law school. Thus, to show that the California court order was not admissible in Florida, the lawyer had to show a chain of custody. But, there was no such showing as the record showed that, a few years earlier, a California court issued a contempt order, but no subsequent court obtained the record of that order and certified a copy of it. In Ojeda, there was a chain of custody and the court found that, therefore, admission of the certified copy was constitutionally permissible. The same is not true of the current case. The current case involves a finding of contempt. And, the record shows that no court, under the Constitution, has the power to issue contempt orders. A contempt order, however, is an entirely different legal entity. As a result, a finding of contempt cannot show chain of custody. The lack of a chain of custody means that the record is inadmissible. As such, no constitutional violation occurred, and the Florida court did not err in denying the lawyer's motion to vacate a previous order that held him in contempt and fined him.
