The structures that form the heart of Earth's space vehicles (space shuttles, spacecrafts etc) are called launch vehicles or rockets. I think there are some other structures that are important to spaceflight, like interplanetary spacecraft, antennas, landers, etc. What are these other structures called? A: A bit of a difficult question. The shorter answer is, "It depends what you're talking about." The longer answer is that the various stages of spacecraft vary widely in their architecture, and it's difficult to categorize them as a whole. For example, what are the stages of the ISS? How about the stages of the space shuttle? This is all a bit fuzzy, because the stages are often composite in nature: they incorporate new subsystems and components to develop the vehicle from one stage to another. (For example, rocket nozzles change and in most cases must be replaced over the course of an ascent, with the major portion of the design process and construction effort going into the first or second stage of the vehicle and the major portion of the part itself going into the third stage of the vehicle.) There are common names for a number of these components, of course. Those include "space tug" and "space tugboat" for the first stage, "orbiter" for a number of stages, "rocket" (or "stage") for the second stage, and "rocket" for the third stage. Thus, the second stage is also sometimes called the "spaceplane" or "boost stage" or "launch vehicle", and the third stage is called the "spaceplane" or "landing stage", "return stage", or "reentry vehicle", among other things. Similarly, what is the target of all the various "space walks"? The answer to this

Apatite formation is one of the most important events for mineralization in bone and teeth. Human periodontal ligament (hPDL) cells are reported to produce bone-like apatite in vitro. In this study, we investigated the relationship between apatite formation and nitric oxide (NO) production in primary hPDL cells. 0cc13bf012
