Addiction is taking over the world, we are causing irreversible damage to the environment, the world is spinning out of control as more people escape to the virtual reality of a new world. They say the virtual world is nothing more than an illusion, a distraction, but it's all we have left to turn to as the real world spirals into an impossible mess of its own making. Now, you have an opportunity to control the course of the new world and make humanity a better place. At the same time, you must decide if the new world has been worth the price of losing what little humanity we had left. Features: ■ An original, unique, and sometimes challenging game. ■ Co-op multiplayer. A 3rd player can join to give you support in moments of need. ■ Adjustable difficulty to suit your preference. ■ Avoid or fly through different scenarios and background environments. ■ Try to survive the crushing buildings or the deadly laser guns. ■ Test your reaction time in a race against the environment. ■ Earn badges as you progress through the stages. ■ Earn achievements and collect trophies. ■ Experience crazy levels in which all you have is a simple jetpack What's New: ? We've bumped up the difficulty in main game modes ? Added more seasonal fun themes ? Available in English, French, Italian, Portuguese, Spanish, Russian and Swedish languages Known Issues: ? What's new:

The term "plague", in association with Egyptology, is perhaps best applied to the outbreaks of coughing sickness that were prevalent during the New Kingdom, or First Intermediate Period. This time period is understood to have begun c. 1550 BC and lasted until c. 1069 BC. These epidemics were probably caused by Mycoplasma pneumoniae (formerly known as Micrococcus pneumoniae) and streptococcal infections, which are responsible for most cases of the common cold. Some unknown virulent agents may have been responsible for some deaths, since most cases were mild and cured without any further treatment. The afflictions of this second ancient plague were the same as in contemporary Europe and its method of recovery was the same as in modern epidemics. Although the term "plague" most often refers to the lethal pneumonic septicemic form of bubonic plague, it also includes the common, mild and harmless catarrhal form of plague (sometimes called "sopor".[1]). Egyptologist Wallis Budge stated that this plague was "of great antiquity, and of a very destructive type." [2] The prevalence of the Plague of the First Intermediate Period in Egypt is likely to have been exaggerated by the dominance of Bubonic Plague in Europe. Egypt was likely a frequent staging area for Black Death plagues carried on by infected Arabs.[3][4] The first-intermediate plague, Bubonic Plague, killed 13 million people in the 14th Century in Europe. Bubonic Plague most likely spread between victims by the entrance of contaminated black rat fleas, Rat flea pullets, into the skin of their human hosts via contaminated hands, utensils, or fomites, which can be infected in turn by fleas.[5] There are different modes of transmission and the means of prevention of two strains of bubonic plague. Efficacy of treatment is highest when the onset of the disease is treated appropriately early in the course of its duration. Bubonic Plague has a wide variety of transmission routes, including direct contact, bites of infected animals, close contact with the sick, and iatrogenic (patient-to-health provider) spread. Animals can be infected, but they do not normally transmit the infection to humans. In humans, bubonic plague causes a benign flu-like illness with fever, headache, chills, and a swollen, tender lymph node in the armpit (indicated by the word "bubo" in the word plague)
