Open the file manager and go to the app folder. 3. Open the security folder. 4. Double tap on the oil enterprise apk file. 5. Wait until the download is complete. Over the past few years, Google has been quietly buying up all sorts of locations for its future "Project Ara," a modular smartphone platform, in urban apartment buildings all around the world, from the UK to Canada to India. I've always thought that most of these high-end apartments are somewhat haphazard in their design and likely not great real estate, but Google says that one in particular, located in the middle of California's Silicon Valley, makes for some of the best (and most fascinating) selling prices for Ara. Google just put out a blog post detailing the sale

Developer's Guide to: Spun Glass Written by: Andrew Hazelden

Creating a game means choosing certain properties of your game: your art style, your game play, the narrative, the graphics, and so on. If your game has no art style, no gameplay, no narrative or any other value, then you shouldn't call yourself a game developer. When it comes to art style, you are highly responsible for owning your art direction. It is based on you and your organization. Your narrative is the story of the game. It doesn't mean the game has some sort of obvious narrative and you've just got to fill it in. Narrative in Spun Glass means telling the story the way you want it to be told, which includes all directions at all times. As with narrative, you are the author of the gameplay. Even if your gameplay doesn't have any content, you define the things that you want your game to do. Wherever you look, game development is a thing only someone can do. If you think you can make a game, you are just a fool. Most "game developers" can't even recognize if a game isn't a game or not. So, the question is: why would you develop something when others will make a game out of it? The reason: your game fits the idea perfectly! Playing a game is an awesome experience. No one has ever played a game before that they didn't enjoy. I can't imagine someone playing a game where they never like a game. Why? Because you have nothing to offer to make it enjoyable. Game development is about understanding the kind of players that want the game. Easy games should only have an easy difficulty level. Puzzle games should have puzzles. The point of such games is that they are quick to learn and provide a nice reward when you are ready to progress through the puzzle. In Spun Glass, we've played Puzzle games for years. We had a bunch of screenshots involving changing colors. We had some puzzle solving. We had a cute story. We had a storyboard, assets and some pixelart-but it all felt like we were just adding little more than a lot of things to an existing core gaming experience. We had no interesting
