However, I have seen a lot of people recommend to always be explicit and cast with, for example, (T) foo() or CAST(T) foo() and run-time checks. Are there any situations where this casts are useful? A: Without casting you don't have access to the type. With casting you have access to more properties and methods, such as CompareTo, Equals, GetHashCode etc. In theory you could use these methods to detect if your object really is of a particular type, however to use them you first need to cast it. The only time I can think of where you shouldn't cast a managed object is when you have a more specific type. For example: // This is a Func which I don't know what T is var delegate = (Func)foo; // This is a delegate which accepts T, but I don't know what T is var typeConverter = (TypeConverter)typeof(T); var converted
