The aim of this study was to investigate the effect of a local application of micro-osteonectin, a collagenous protein obtained from bone extracts, in a human burn wound model. The study involved 20 patients with severe burns and 32 patients with non-severe burns. During the first and sixth week, the following parameters were investigated: Wound closure and late epithelization, sebum quantity on the wound surface, numbers of microorganisms (quantitative count and colonial counting method) and several inflammatory and nutritional parameters (erythrocyte sedimentation rate, C-reactive protein, pre-albumin, transferrin, albumin, and total protein). Other parameters analyzed were the need for insulin treatment, infections and mortality. The wounds in the group of severe burns showed a greater tendency to epithelialization. In all groups, pre-albumin levels were higher in the first week compared with the sixth week. On the other hand, C-reactive protein values showed a significant difference between the first and sixth week, and the erythrocyte sedimentation rate in the severe group showed a significant difference in the sixth week. The immunological studies revealed a significant increase in white blood cell values at the end of the first week in all groups. The statistical analysis of the patient records revealed a reduction of insulin requirements in the severe group.
