What's new in Elden Ring:

Six months after the Obama administration's failure to protect jobs in the Iranian nuke deal with the country, U.S. security analysts have been piecing together the details. Indeed, the Heritage Foundation's Long War Journal, a 13-year project to monitor terrorist and insurgent activity around the globe, has declared that this year "has been the deadliest in years for U.S. troops in Afghanistan and a year of steady progress in a grinding counterinsurgency campaign" in Iraq. David Asher and Adam Kredo were early American investigators who wrote a thorough report on the Iran deal for the Heritage Foundation. Ben Freeman, executive director of the National Iranian American Council, has also been fact-checking the deal. I expect supporters and opponents of the Iranian deal will be reading the recent articles by these and other experts. But if you haven't been thinking about the Obama administration's failure to force companies to refuse to sell them goods with ties to Iran, check out some hardnosed reporting at the Daily Caller here, here, and here. The Obama administration has given a weak, incoherent, and fact-challenged response to the flurry of stories about the administration's inexplicable failure to force a single U.S. company to stand up to Iran. "This is just spinning," former U.S. Ambassador to the United Nations John Bolton told the Daily Caller. "They are not going to do anything." According to reports, officials from seven U.S. companies — Boeing, Caterpillar, General Electric, General Motors, Google, Intel, and Microsoft — have told the Treasury Department they had no plans to stand up to Iran. None of them required demands of the U.S. government as a condition for doing business in Iran. Administration officials often point to the Commerce Department's findings that private companies have stepped up to the plate and refused to do business with Iran. But the findings were based on 2010 letters to companies requesting them to refuse to sell Iran anything and were published long after the companies had received those letters, This is just spin," former U.S. Ambassador to the United Nations John Bolton told the Daily Caller. "They are not going to do anything." President Obama's act of subservience to Mahmoud Ahmadinejad over the weekend - in the wake of comments he made

We found a little store/take-out place where we were able to grab a couple loaves and lunch was served to us in plastic tubs from a plate we brought. I don't think the mayor knows we're here. LOL There was a bike on the sidewalk that, when it got dark, we saw had an added feature that made it move a lot like one of our tractors. And the values must be changeable to be able to read in the values. Example: my input is 00001010 the output i need the method to return 11100, but i am allowed to change the data type i can use e.g. long long int or bigint I tried to translate the given binary values into the hex values, but i realized that not all values can be translated, and there is also a big range of binary values for the hex values. So after looking at the binary data type. The values must be an integer type. My plan was to make a function where you can input a binary data type and it will return the hex representation of the value, for example: 00001010 = 11100 Result: 946 Where $946 = 1111 * 256 + 0010$, see right? That's what i want.
