Cock-a-Doodle-Do, Cockeyed Helicopters are the most amazing flying machines ever built. They take off and land vertically, they cannot be shot down or crashed. They have two propellers, two rotors, two blades each. Their pilot is the nose, or cock. Helicopters can either be a single, double, or triple rotor. Cockeys can choose any helicopter with the exception of the two off-limits models; the triple rotor and the single rotor. As with anything in life, there are pros and cons of choosing the right cock for the right chopper. Cock's features can include: - Weapon - Backpack - HUD - Landing Gear - Tuning The game takes place in the fictional city of Junk City, where in each round you must complete a list of objectives. In each round, all cockeys will go head to head in a single player mode or up to 9 players in a battle mode. When you are cockeyed helicopter pilot, your mission is to survive and survive well. Junk City is plagued by a world-wide epidemic called the Locust Plague that paralyzes people and turns every city into a network of corridors. The locusts are an aggressive and ruthless species and an average of 15,000 locusts are reported to eat a person a day. In addition, Junk City is crawling with locusts, and there are several new species in the game; The locust weevil and the locust beetle. The locust weevil is a small and aggressive insect that attacks the cock of a helicopter. As with all of the new species, each locust in the game has unique abilities, and all of these are included in the engine; attack patterns, special attacks, and even the gear used. Cockeys will be able to use anything they find in the world to defend themselves and to take down their opponents. Equipment consists of: - Weapons - Tools - Gear - Explosives Cockeys also have a weapons loadout that can have as many as 11 pieces of equipment (3+3 or 3+1+1+1) that will be selected from a list of items as they are picked up. Cock's weapons loadout can be carried using the backpack system, or alternately, it can be stored in the cockpit and

Address Fellow rider on the road I ride... check him out at www.alfredoarego.com (His picture is great...) By nathan bianchineanu on June 12th, 2009 on 10:50 pm I've been riding the Tele for a few months now and I have to say that after the first few rides it really settles down and becomes a natural thing to ride around the city. You just need to get into the Tele (have a seat on it) and adjust it to your comfort level and after that, you're good to go. It's not overly heavy and the initial experience, although might take a week or two, doesn't start getting cumbersome once you get rolling. The ergonomic position on the bike is so great and so comfortable that you really forget its there! Originally, I had only ridden fixed gears and used to ride a Schwinn Horizon, which was roughly the same weight as the Tele. At first I thought that the lighter tire and frame would cause it to ride a bit differently, but that didn't turn out to be the case. Its true that the lighter than expected heavier steering is what really makes a difference in the handling of the motorcycle. But I suppose at the end of the day it all comes down to the vehicle. One would not ride a Japanese sedan for any reason (imagine how nice the seating and handling would be!!!)... it would just be weird. When I purchased my machine, the only thing I remember finding in it was one bolt holding a seat to the frame. With that concern, I started looking at technical specifications and funnily, it turns out that this model of Tele has a design flaw. After all, I was contemplating riding a motorcycle that was perfect ergonomically, comfortable, powerful and with a more pleasant ride, so it seemed like part of the conditions of sale was of more than symbolic significance. And thankfully, since, the bike was only good until proven bad. As such, the maintenance record was sketchy at best! I only found one occurrence that may actually have been due to design. The bike was originally equipped with full face, chin high exhausts. While riding it and taking it for a test drive, I noticed that when I had my foot on the gas and it was completely lined up with my body (think point a of my bent leg to the rear of the vehicle), the rear end

Sorry to disappoint you, but this isn't an RPG Maker game. It's a quirky adventure game that will feature classic RPG elements, but also set it apart with a number of unique game mechanics that I'm not keen on explaining before someone makes a game with those same mechanics. (It's just my opinion that this is a poor way to make an RPG, but that's a conversation for another time.) For the time being, I'm going to explain what I think sets this game apart, and then I'll get to the heart of the issue; Why am I doing this?

The Creative Perspective: I love writing. Writing, in my opinion, is the greatest form of art because every paragraph and sentence are the artist's fingerprint, his most personal decisions and inspirations. I love the creative process because it is constantly in a constant state of growth, and there's always more to come. And for me, creating and writing are completely intertwined. Thus, I've decided to make an indie game that consists of a series of short vignettes interwoven into an immersive, emotional narrative.

The Subconscious Project: In the last few months, I've been writing, designing, and planning the creative process behind a game that I want to call "Every detail counts." This game has been bouncing around my head for a very long time, and I've finally managed to make the first viable step towards realizing that dream.

Vilebranch: This game is about a war that's in the process of breaking out. As the result of the first country being invaded by the other ones, it has turned the entire world into a warzone. Most countries have experienced a revolution at the hands of a populist leader. Through the revolution, however, each and every country has lost the right to use its own currency. Thus, each country, instead of using their own paper money, use the currency of the last country they invaded. As a result, money isn't scarce. As a matter of fact, money is the most abundant commodity on the planet. Every minute of every day, hundreds of millions of dollars are siphoned away from the victims of the previous country's invasion and given to the invading country. However, corruption is a constant problem, and the leaders of the economy's greedy. Thus, many countries are unable to pay for basic necessities; Food, Light, Medical care, etc. Naturally, this would cause a revolution in favor of those who have nothing, but it
