like a plumber, a business will hire one of their many independent representatives to sell products or services to you. In the twenty first century, people want the consumer to have the power and the choice to go straight to the manufacturer and purchase their products online and in person, but this approach is risky. The biggest deterrent to this is trust. How can you trust a company you don't know personally? You need to be able to trust the seller. This is why there are thousands of "reputable" independent dealers out there, with a variety of reputations. This has made it difficult for customers to know which dealers are trustworthy. The problem with trust is that it is built on something you can't see, and is not built by the dealer. Customers need to trust in the fairness of the independent dealer. Every product and service is different, and for that reason, it is essential to look at more than just the price when shopping for any service. The true value of independent dealers is their knowledge and experience. Dealers know the products better than any one vendor, and are able to offer customer service and advice on products and services that may not be widely available. Customers who trust independent dealers know they are not only getting the best products and services, but also the best customer service. Some of the things an independent dealer can do that a large manufacturer cannot are:

- Better selection of products.
- Better product for a lower price.
- Products that are non-competes.
- Better customer service.
- Better warranty and extended services.
- Better availability and quick response to service calls.

To have one of your products promoted through independent dealers, you need to not only look for the
