Why does the output of AC current and DC current flow in same direction at ground potential when the external load is negative? We have seen in the past that a positive resistor shorts more voltage to the ground than a negative resistor. For example, the two states of a one amp AC motor are a positive and negative resistance. My question is why does the output current flow in the same direction at ground potential when the external load is negative? A: The simple answer is that the input is a battery, the rest of the system is grounded. simulate this circuit – Schematic created using CircuitLab At the input the voltage is always positive and thus the current always flows in the direction of the V.

This is simply because the current source has a much higher impedance than the rest of the circuit. Citations
