IFCDataExchange.Q: Use Babel compile to extract out certain exports from a webpack bundle I'm using webpack to bundle and minify my javascript. But, I'd like to do a compile to extract out certain things that I don't need for myself, but for an API that I am building. Specifically, I have a function that I would like to expose via the api which will list all articles by a user, but I don't need the client to know that the user is an article. How can I use Babel to do this? A: I may be misunderstanding the purpose of what you're doing, but I could imagine a module exporting an object like this: const Mod = (...args) => { const api = {}; api.listArticles = (user) => { // do your magic here } return api; } Then, if you import a module, you could just do this: const Mod = require('path/to/your-module'); Mod.listArticles(); Malignancy of papillary and follicular duct carcinomas of the thyroid. And even though it's still very basic, I've been able to use it for a lot of fun visualization techniques. The PlotKit project is still at its early stages so there is a lot that could be improved. But with the community backing it now, there is more potential for it to grow and extend. If you've been following the PFWiki, you might have noticed an up and coming project called PlotKit. It's still in its early stages, but the ambition with it is to be a powerful visualization framework. The idea is to build in the future functionality for data stacks, custom base classes for plotting, and a range of more complex widgets and visualization techniques.
