The latest discovery of a potential 'missing link' in the dinosaur family tree has prompted an Australian museum to publish its inaugural dinosaur artwork exhibit. The museum's curator David Evans said the discovery meant scientists had cracked the code of ancient reptile genealogy and had put to bed the 'Dumbellaboy' theory. "What we're really excited about here, which is causing a great deal of excitement in the media, is that it's finally recognised that there is a family tree to dinosaurs, it's not all a pack of lizards wandering around saying 'yum' all the time," he said. "It's not all a pack of lizards wandering around saying 'yum' all the time. It's actually a tree." The realisation came after scientists discovered fossils of two small, feathered therapod dinosaurs and a plate-like skull. The find, described as a huge breakthrough in dinosaur research, is believed to link the two long-separated species in a single lineage. It's prompted scientists to describe the new dinosaurs as perhaps the most basal members of an all-reptile family tree. "It's really exciting - it's very exciting for everybody associated with this story," Evans said. "Now that there's a family tree, we can look up at it and say 'well this is basal to birds, that's basal to the carnosaurs, that's basal to coelurosaurs, that's basal to sauropodomorphs. "So we can start to understand how these features were evolving towards birds." Evans said the realisation was long overdue, and had changed the way scientists thought about dinosaurs. "The thing that got us excited about this is that you and I have probably thought about dinosaurs for years and years and years, but we've been caught up by a pack of lizards saying 'yum' all the time. We never really thought about this family tree," he said. "There's a lot of time and a lot of hard work that's gone into this family tree, and it's exciting because the family tree opens up a whole new way of looking at the history of the different dinosaurs."Q: How to keep my Rails 3.2 project running when I restart my computer?
