Factors predicting failure of intravesical tapered Silastic implants to control delayed urinary tract infection. Eighty tapered Silastic implants, ranging from 20 to 30 F, were inserted in the submucosa of the ureter to investigate the predictors of failure. These implants were placed in patients with chronic unilateral or bilateral ureteral and pyelonephritic calculous obstruction, or as part of a renal transplantation procedure. Postimplantation urinary tract infections (UTIs) were treated and the patients were monitored for up to 2 years. The overall success rate was 77.5%. The UTI incidence was similar in the case of left versus right side implants (P greater than 0.2), although the number of left side implants was small. The incidence of UTI did not decrease with increasing implant size (P greater than 0.1), except in the case of the renal transplant patients, who experienced a significantly lower rate of UTI (P less than 0.05). The tapered implant was successful in only 53.6% of the renal transplant patients (P less than 0.05). Likewise, the tapered implant was successful in only 22% of the remaining patients, and the incidence of UTI was significantly higher in these patients than in the rest of the cohort (P less than 0.05). We conclude that although the tapered implant is useful for effective drainage of the upper urinary tract in patients with obstructive urolithiasis and renal transplantation, its use is associated with a high incidence of UTI, particularly in the renal transplant patients.
