Prevention of testicular cancer. Testicular cancer is the most common solid tumor among 15- to 45-year-old young males. The reported risk of testicular cancer among U.S. young males is 1 in 350, but the incidence among Israeli young males is approximately 1 in 20,000. While the incidence in some other industrialized countries is also very low, they are rising in several European countries. It is estimated that there is a four to fivefold excess of testicular cancer among persons with the Klinefelter syndrome. The data suggest that late puberty is linked to the occurrence of testicular cancer, but it is not clear whether this observation represents a cause or a consequence of the tumor. Several risk factors for testicular cancer have been proposed, including viral infections, occupational exposures, genetics, and lifestyle, but none of them has been firmly established as a cause. Fortunately, testicular cancer is highly treatable. Most patients can be cured either by orchiectomy (removal of the testicles) or by radical orchiectomy and irradiation of the retroperitoneal lymph nodes. Treatment of patients with testicular cancer is based on the analysis of risk factors and stage of disease. Ask HN: Has there been any notable decrease in COVID-19 in China? - aaronbrethorst ===== w8rbt I think the key is whether the disease spreads through asymptomatic carriers. Will test positive, and then (almost) instantly die, or will be asymptomatic and disappear, and then spread to other people during the incubation period. Also, if the virus can survive on surfaces for days, then it can easily be spread by someone coughing, sneezing, talking, or wearing contaminated clothing after it has been removed. ----- pizza yes, significantly. Despite the huge success of every individual, retail profits are declining steadily. If you compare the sales of Apple in 2009 with the sales of Apple in 2015, then you can see a decline of 6 percent in the 2o-f, so the e79caf774b
