keeps kids cool, sassy For city officials and a group of high school students, the playground at Playland Park was a low budget, low priority project that not only paid for itself, but gave a priceless introduction to their government. Renovations at the make-believe playground were financed by a $3.5 million U.S. Department of Agriculture program designed to encourage and help cities create small, neighborhood recreation centers. Based on a concept by city traffic engineer Jan Van Riper, Playland incorporates heat and humidity filters into the playground's five rigid-framed, igloo-shaped play areas to keep children cool, while shelters and a free-standing building with two bathrooms help them stay dry. "I was wondering what would happen if we put a budget on a playground," said Mayor Quinton Sweickert. "I don't know where the money would come from. We didn't feel it was important to spend money for the most part. It took on a life of its own. We didn't realize how much it would take to install it." Playland was planned by the city's Green Team and overseen by park, recreation and community development engineer Bob Jenning from Kansas City, Kan., as well as the playground's developer Brian Bozell, who came up with the idea of using the public schools' summer programs to help pay for it. Several "advisory group" meetings were held at schools in the city to get input from parents, teachers, school administrators, staff and students. Staff from the park and recreation commission met with the advisory group, which included coordinators from the area's Boy Scouts, Boys and Girls Club, as well as members of the Friends of Playland, a nonprofit created to help fund the project. The city's public works department was able to save $80,000 by doing a major remodeling of a police detention cell at the park where the igloo canopies now go, as well as $8,000 in community improvement contributions from Pittsburg residents who volunteered to help paint, lay floor tile, add light fixtures and repair the playground. The project's rough budget was $75,000, about a quarter of the total. Smaller projects paid for by the program cost about $50,000, according to Sweickert. "We

Such minimally invasive techniques may be done either with a traditional open surgery technique or a minimally invasive surgical technique. Traditional open surgeries usually involve large incisions and high amounts of tissue damage. In minimally invasive surgical techniques, surgical devices such as endoscopes or catheters are typically used to access surgical sites through smaller incisions or through body walls. The benefits of minimizing patient recovery time and reducing the chance of complications associated with traditional open surgery, while still allowing a surgeon to perform the surgical procedure with high precision, may be particularly advantageous in such minimally invasive surgical techniques.
