Even during the second quarter of 2001, the stock price was rising, with the stock reaching a high of $86.05 a share on August 21st. Enron has been in a long-running narrative of contention, with shareholder lawsuits, ongoing SEC investigations, and a federal criminal investigation all having to do with its accounting practices and collapse. The company filed for bankruptcy in December, which affected its stock. But it's still being called the "breakout star" and a "richer version of Yahoo." The stock had a beta of 0.98 in May 2005, meaning that it was much more volatile than the overall market and the company was more sensitive to volatility in the market. However, in September, it suffered from a trading halt that resulted in a rise in the beta that was over 5. Any uptick in uncertainty should result in higher volatility and lower pricing. However, other factors should also come into play, including the company's financial strength, possible acquisitions, and new accounting practices under scrutiny. Among these things, the above-average beta appears to be justified. According to S3 Partners, the Int'l Business Exchange Corp and the Filling Station Index, an industry group, Enron's beta in September was 1.32. This was 1.82 times the S&P 500, which would make Enron the fifth most volatile stock in the S&P 500, with a percentage volatility 5.5% greater than
