More specifically, it relates to a method of detecting flaw in a powder mold for the reproduction of a pattern of circuit or the like, for example, produced from a printing plate for producing an IC or the like by using an etching resist and, further, to the method of detecting flaw in a mold for producing a molding for molding an IC or the like which is produced by etching a metal substrate or the like. In the prior art, a detection of flaw has been performed by using a method wherein a powder material is applied on the surface of a board after the etching of the pattern on a printing plate to detect the presence or absence of a flaw, or a method wherein a powder material is applied to a molding produced by the injection molding of a resin and having an etching resist embedded therein, and the molding thus applied is then etched and then, by detecting the position of a flaw, the position of the flaw is determined. In the prior art method of detecting flaw, the powder is applied to the inner surface of the molding and then the surface is etched. In this prior art method, it is inconvenient to remove the powder from the surface of the molding and to bring the powder into contact with the etching solution. Further, when detecting the position of a flaw or the position of a flaw in a mold by the prior art method, for example, by a photographic method or by a visual inspection method, the detection of flaw is often difficult, due to the powder being embedded in the inner surface of the molding, the difficulty of bringing the powder into contact with the etching solution, etc., and furthermore, a flaw of a portion other than the designed pattern cannot be detected.My book...
