Cutaneous and subcutaneous capillary occlusion and hemorrhage after topical corticosteroid use. Topical corticosteroids are generally associated with a reduced risk of systemic and ocular adverse effects. The reported incidence of local adverse effects is variable and has not been previously quantified. This study documents the clinical risk of adverse effects of topical corticosteroids. All patients presenting with a dermatology problem during a 2-year period were asked to complete a questionnaire form. The questionnaire assessed whether the patient had used a topical corticosteroid (alone or in combination with other topical therapy) within the past 3 weeks. The study was performed at the Royal Alexandra Hospital, Paisley, Scotland. Cases were identified by review of records. Data on the numbers of patients receiving topical corticosteroids during the 2-year period were obtained from the Dermatology Department and General Practice records. Of the 579 patients who completed the questionnaire, 47 (8.3%) were prescribed topical corticosteroids within the preceding 3 weeks. Thirty-six patients continued this therapy, and 11 patients interrupted or ceased it. Two patients had subcutaneous hemorrhage in the region of their previous steroid application. One patient had a cutaneous hemorrhage with a predilection for the area of previous steroid application. Five patients had small areas of local skin atrophy or weakness in the area of previous steroid application. Two patients had systemic or local signs or symptoms of adrenal insufficiency, and one patient discontinued therapy because of loss of vision in one eye. Adverse effects of topical corticosteroids may include cutaneous hemorrhage with a predilection for the region of application and local atrophy or weakness.
