The hot water heater may not cause a problem as long as you don t fix it, especially if you check the flow rate with a. But seems like overloading controller logic in the model creates a huge maintenance issue as you have to test on all the possible combinations of the data you are going to be receiving etc. One solution is to add data access logic in the model using the Repository/UOW pattern and place the shared data in a data cache like EF or NHProfiles but that means more refactoring effort. My only suggestion here is to build more entities that will act as the glue between the domain and the model. I prefer to decouple domain and model when it is possible (e.g. a list of items) as it makes it easier to test and promotes vertical/horizontal code splitting. No, it will not but it would make your code more complicated and as I mentioned above it won't be good. Also what do you do for IoC when testing? Do you know if you can write external unit tests for your IoC container? Yes you can and it is very common to do so. You can make a dependency provider class and pass it to your controllers as parameters so that you can easily mock out the dependency at runtime. Q: I need to know how to access c# console functions from c++ when hosting my console app in visual studio Is there a way to access c# functions from c++? I need to use the C# Console.ReadLine() function from c++ and I am aware that it returns a string but I need to get the actual user's input. I tried using the Plnvoke (unsure what it is called) function CreateEvent. A: Here's the C++ Plnvoke signature: [DIIImport("kernel32.dll", SetLastError = true)] static extern bool CreateEvent(IntPtr IpEventAttributes, bool bManualReset, bool bInitialState, string IpName); The first three arguments are the event creation flags, the fourth argument is the name of the event. When the event is created, the name that has been given will be used in the thread message loop. Once you've created the event, you need to manually set up the default input and output with _beginthreadex and endthreadex

We all know that in C and C++, pointers have the same properties as the object they point to. So what is the difference between them? A: Pointers and references have two main properties: they point to an object/variable; they may be modified Therefore, we have pointers, which point to an object; const references, which may point to an object (or they may not - they may only be modified and not dereferenced), but they cannot be modified. But they also have at least two other important properties: they have the same size (in memory) as the pointed-to object; they can be treated as an object (or not, in case of references): i.e. a pointer can be dereferenced and the result (the pointedto object) can be treated like an integer, or you can write printf("%d",
