Adding errorbars in a matrix of not-realistic signals I'm plotting a matrix of 50 signals, and need to color the blanks. This is what I've come up with: data = [... ]; fill_data = []; for i = 1 : length(data) for j = 1 : length(data(i)) if j == 1 fill_data = [fill_data;signal(i,:)]; else fill_data(j,end) = 50; end end end colors = 'y'; % I will eventually add more constraints color_mapping = jet(size(data,1)); for k = 1 : length(data) k = [k int2str(k)]; for n = 1 : length(data(k)) fill_data(k,end) = (colors == 'r')? data(k,n) : fill_data(k,end); end fill_data = (colors == 'r')? fill_data : fill_data(:); end imagesc(fill_data); colorbar('Non-realistic errorbars may get lost in areas with many zero entries. Specify manually'); %this line adds very large error c9d1549cdd

Studies investigating the orthographic-phonetic correspondence have not revealed a consensus of the relations between phoneme and orthography. We assessed the phonetic representation of 5,023 words using an information retrieval method: a target word was selected and its phonetic reading process simulated by searching phonological representations of the target and other similar words using suffix or affix. We evaluated the score of the closest phonetic reading based on the code-feature (feature and phoneme) model and several factors, such as word length, phonological similarity of the closest reading, phonetic similarity of the closest reading, articulatory similarity of phonetic representation, and phonetic similarity of the closest reading and the target word. The results showed that the phonological similarity between the target and the closest reading, the phonetic similarity between the closest reading and the target, and the articulatory similarity of the phonetic representation have a greater influence on the phonetic performance of the closest reading than the phonetic similarity of the closest reading and the target. The phonetic similarity of the closest reading and the target influenced the phonetic performance depending on whether the closest reading was in

What's new in SokoBunny:

_ This tiny butterfly comes from the slopes of Manali in Himachal Pradesh, and has migrated to the sub-continent for the third or fourth time. It hides in the grass during the day and comes out at dusk to drink nectar from the tiny white flowers of grass that bloom in the early morning. The light brownish-yellow body is lined with red on the front dorsum, red and black on the orange-yellow hindwing, which are reversed with brilliant white markings on the abdomen, and the underside is highlighted with gold. The real butterfly is skinnier than the portrayal here. Reproduced by kind permission of Martin Gorman, Hampshire Treasures, Winchester, Hants, UK Never let a butterfly rest until you have captured it. The same applies to wildlife photographs. All personal success in photography is thanks to photographs that have been shot while the photographer has at least 70% focus on the wild creature. The instinctive skill of an experienced birder or wildlife photographer needs to be learned and practiced from time to time, and can never be entirely perfect. You should not be discouraged if you see the same subject photographed, for the pure experience of living and breathing in the everyday incident with an eagle or a butterfly eludes the camera's eye. Ultimately, _wildlife_ is only a beautiful component of a natural scene. It's a moment of aesthetic beauty that, too often, is ignored by urban photographers. When you come across a great representation of wildlife, such as this image of a mother bear in the snow, send a note of appreciation to the kind person who captured the image, and then try to get the same image yourself. Different material and light required of photography means you'll not duplicate the experience. As with other beauty, the kind or not is a matter of taste, and your trip back in time to look at a particular subject can be vastly different. Only the awareness of having _seen_ will give you experience, and then on your own artistic horizons can travel. Wyrth's Puddle, _Reversed Feathered Water_* A birder and keen photographer on his daily rounds in northern Scotland, Werner photographically abhors the school of "liquid photography" that so many photographers evolve from a travel experience. He feels that we should not substitute the information in a good viewfinder view, and the composition within the pressure of the shutter release
