There is a two-way clamp with a magnet or something similar, which can be used to, say, cut a cable, or, say, pull some wires. I've often installed programs, and forgotten to unzip the zipped program or write it to a disk. As I later discovered, the program was cracked, though it appeared in the list as invalid, so I was asked for the registration key of the program. That's how hackers do it. So a piece of equipment will ask you for the key, even if you didn't install anything. So, if you install programs to a drive, make sure you also write it on a disk/CD, or just unzip it. There are, however, two ways to crack such a block. You can use a special electronic device, and some software. Or, you can bend the clamp (not exactly easy), or use a file and a program that will try all keys. For example, you would just make a file with 200 keys, go to the unit, and make a file with this number. And every time the unit asks for the key, you just go to the unit, and open this file, and enter the code. Then, when the unit asks you for a password, you'll input the key you just found out in the file. If you find that easier, you can just use the device. When the software asks for a password, it will try to get the password from the device, and the device will tell you the key, and you just enter the key in the software. Using the device, the easiest way is to connect to the unit, and when you enter a password, the device will tell you the key, and when the software asks for the password, it'll be the key. When you connect to the unit, enter a key, connect to the unit, enter the password, disconnect.

It may be easier to make a small program that does the same. Another
