GIMP gimp.org Photoshop versus GIMP? They are both excellent, but they are designed for different needs. Photoshop is designed for professional retouching and design work, while GIMP is designed for general, everyday photo and image work. Photoshop may be used to work with images in GIMP, but it's like using a rake to do paper shredding. To me, I think of Photoshop as the laptop and GIMP as the tiny mobile device. The photo on the computer screen is like a camera, and the computer screen is like the camera's viewfinder. The laptop is the computer, and the camera is the digital camera. Like most image editors, GIMP's layers are based on the work of Photoshop and other image editors. Because GIMP is very easy to use, the computer that it runs on is the `_graphics tablet_` (a tablet with a drawing surface, like a drawing pad or a paintbrush). When an image is edited with the computer's mouse, the images are built up layer by layer. When you press the drawing tablet's eraser, it erases the lower layers, not the image. When you look through the camera's viewfinder, the focus is on the drawing surface, and you can move, zoom, and rotate images with your fingers. **Keyboard Shortcuts for Work** If you're not familiar with the keyboard shortcuts for GIMP, they are listed on the "image-editing" page on the GIMP homepage, www.gimp.org. • **Ctrl+** is the shortcut key for selecting an object. For example, to select the word `_gimp_` in a page, use `Ctrl+A` to select the entire page and move the mouse cursor into the page. Then
