UNITED NATIONS (AP) — For four decades, the United States has exported the world's most robust anti-drug arsenal to war zones and trouble spots throughout the globe. Now, amid concerns that U.S. security and military positions are being undermined by the rising influence of foreign militants and state-sponsored terrorists, Washington has decided to slow the pace of such transfers. In the waning days of a meeting of the 193-member U.N. General Assembly, the United States raised objections to the organization's annual drug control agenda, complaining that it focuses too much on law enforcement and not enough on the illicit cultivation, processing and trafficking of drugs. The Obama administration joined an unusually sharp criticism of the United Nations, which was a frequent target of President Barack Obama in the past. "We do think the U.N. Drug Control Program is an important and constructive element of the global drug control agenda," U.S. Ambassador Susan Rice said Wednesday. "However, we are also deeply concerned about a number of issues in this program, and we believe that the approach advocated in this draft resolution is not the best way to address the challenge of illicit drugs." The U.S. position is in sharp contrast with long-standing U.N. rhetoric and the policies of previous administrations.
