This means that: • More physical challenge for players • More authenticity for every player type • More realistic on-ball decisions • Improved artificial intelligence • Better, more realistic player reactions

HyperMotion Technology combines player animations, player body shape and player positional behaviour with physical attributes of real-life players, to give players a completely unprecedented first-person experience. Physically imposing players will overpower and intimidate less-confident opponents with their unique physicality and weight. What does this mean for players? Every player type has different attributes and characteristics that affect their on-field performance. HyperMotion Technology captures a player's unique physicality and weight, enabling more authentic player movement behaviours. How does it work? When a player is tackled, they need to apply more energy than normal, and raise their center of mass, which forces them to take a step backwards to "lift" themselves out of the tackle. To facilitate this movement, the player's body is fitted with a motion capture suit that captures all of his/her movements, and is then animated in-game. When a player is in possession, this motion capture data can be used to modify their on-ball behaviours. The collision between players and the ball has changed in FIFA 22, and collision damage has been increased, making for more physical challenges. Player interception has been further enhanced, and the ball will feel more challenging to hold onto under pressure. Players can more accurately predict where the ball is going with higher accuracy on-ball decisions (such as passes and dribbles), more realistic ball physics and enhanced deflection for close-range efforts. Players will feel greater variety in their physical movements and aim, with more realistic collision and collision avoidance. Attackers and midfielders will now have the ball in more realistic scenarios, more often requiring them to stop and wait for teammates to adjust, or to avoid defenders making off-ball movements. As a result, the timing of off-ball actions such as passes and runs is more unpredictable, requiring players to make smarter decisions, more often than ever before. How will FIFA players benefit from this new technology? Players who want to get the most out of FIFA 22 will need to learn more about the range of new features to take advantage of each player's unique attributes. In order to improve the skill of players, FIFA 22 will provide new and improved instructional
