ABSTRACT The infection dynamics of Aspergillus terreus were studied during the apple season of 2004 in the apple orchards of the Microbiology and Quality Conference at Brno, the Czech Republic. The presence of A. terreus on apples was followed from season to season. The invasion of the fungus in orchards was studied by sampling apples from different fields over time and by detailed surveys in four orchards. A. terreus was present in all five orchards, but the frequencies of colonization were site-dependent, ranging from 40%. The density of conidia in naturally infected apples did not increase, and the average disease incidence at 10% dropped to 8.0%. The presence of conidia on the apples at 1 month after harvest was 33.3%, which probably leads to a decrease in the pathogenicity of the fungal population at that time. Noninfected apples were identified between 7 and 10 weeks after harvest. This observation suggests a significant inoculum reduction during the storage process. The dynamics of infection may differ between
