For example, when you copy a shortcut to the desktop, is it possible to make sure that the target of the shortcut can't be modified by a malicious process? A: Shortcut could be stored as a file When you press Ctrl+C to copy a shortcut, in order to get the file association working, Windows starts a copy process of this file, and the filename of the file is a *.lnk. This is also the path of the file if you store the shortcut on a file system, and therefore is possible for a malicious process to access the file if you store the shortcut on a file system. When you start Windows Explorer and press Ctrl+L to open the shortcut target, then Windows will use the file association of this file. The *.lnk file is an HTML file in compressed and base64-encoded format, starting with the four-character MIME type line: MIME; which expands to MIME-Version: 1.0 Content-type: application/x-ms-shortcut Content-encoding: base64 with the following file name, path and arguments: Encoded of a *.lnk file There are also several different ways to store a file in a compressed format. With 7zip you could find an explanation of the format at With
