Posted: Nov. 2, 2017 7:18 PM Updated: Nov. 2, 2017 10:10 AM The Sinfonia Concerto from the 2016 version of the Central Park Summer Concerts is out. The soundtrack, or suites, of seven of the world's greatest Olympic games - 1904, 1908, 1912, 1920, 1924, 1932, and 1936 - were recorded, and then released as Sinfonia da Venezia, and are considered one of the most beloved and influential classical music albums of all time. Seventy-five years after it was first recorded and released to an audience of millions, the soundtrack, known as Sinfonia da Venezia, has been reissued. With music spanning 80 years, the album pulls listeners back through a century of classical music and back into the timeworn world of rowing at the famed Summer Olympic Games. "I love the fact that you can listen to a side of the Olympics when it's not the flashy stuff. It's about sports, but it's more than sports. It's more about the men and women who play it. I think it's so good to just give people a real connection to those people," says Bernlee. Much like the Games themselves, the broad-reaching project has universal appeal. "I think it's a good idea. I was surprised by how many of my friends listen to classical music," says Thiess. "I started listening to classical music when I was in high school, and I got the whole world of classical music." With classical and jazz music being seemingly under assault in today's media, classical music and jazz concerts have never been more relevant. And, thanks to the soundtrack, it's also never been more accessible. "We kind of get to go back and look at a time when there were more orchestra members, more players, more solos, more big orchestras like the Philadelphia Orchestra and the New
