As mentioned at the top, I tested this pattern with simple stitch markers on the ends of rows 1,3, 5, 7, and 9. This gave me a visual gauge, and it worked very well for me. Once I had designed the shape of the shawl in my head, I cut it out, leaving out the waste yarn tails to be tied in later, and sewed the top together. I was pleased with the design, and decided to leave it as is. I have a new love for shawls after trying mine out! Update: This blog post has been selected as one of the Sweet 16's Best from Day 1. Thanks for reading! The instructions below are adapted from the Dancing with the Dragonflies Hand Stitch eBook by Theresa Adams. Make sure you get the newest edition if you want all the great tutorials on the Dragonfly technique, as well as the updated details about stitch counts and what to do when you run out of yarn. Some of the steps in this tutorial may seem a bit complicated, but do not be fooled! They are all very simple, and some of them are even quite easy. I've been knitting about 2 hours a day for the past 2 weeks, learning this particular technique as part of my journey through the Stitch-a-Long at Taunton in May. The finished shawl is very complex and has 8 panels and a total

PDF: An outline of the basic psychotherapy techniques used in community assessment. A number of approaches to the treatment of mental illness are available. One of the most popular is counselling. The therapist's role in it is most often as a caring listener. As a result it is more popular than many other forms of psychological treatment. It offers an effective form of treatment for certain disorders, particularly anxiety disorders, and some other emotional or behavioural problems. Generally patients can benefit from helping a mate, friend, relative or the family if the patient is unable to function without help. Three important forms of technique used by the therapist in counselling are: listening, questioning and helping. The most common work is to listen. The counsellor should not comment on the content of the problem but should identify it and find out what aspects the patient is concerned about. The therapist then focuses on these aspects and helps the patient to think about the problems and what might help them. The therapist also helps the patient to deal with the emotions associated with the issue and to find ways of coping in a constructive way. Counselling is sometimes offered as a therapy programme in the community, usually by a health service or social welfare organisation.
