Thylakoids have a self-repairing ability to accumulate free magnesium against light stress, which is mediated by a compartmentalized intracellular free Mg(2+) accumulation through Mg-ATPase (Magnesium-adenosine triphosphatase). To understand a physiological function of Mg(2+) sequestered in thylakoids, a molecular genetic strategy was used to disrupt the function of genes for magnesium transport and sequestration. This strategy is based on a specific insertion of recombinant DNAs into thylakoid membrane using the transformation system based on the green fluorescent protein. This strategy was used to disrupt the function of a newly identified magnesium transporter gene, NTT, which is a member of the 2A proton-magnesium transporter family. It was found that the disruption of NTT gene resulted in the accumulation of more than one order of magnitude of magnesium in the mutant thylakoid. This analysis is the first to demonstrate a self-repair ability of thylakoids for magnesium accumulation. The thylakoids were extremely insoluble and trapped several types of enzymes by a high magnesium environment. The soluble form of enzymes is directly linked to a self-repair function of the thylakoids. The mutant
