To achieve a high power density, resistive heating elements (heat resistors) for heating fluids for a wide range of applications are generally produced in a gas phase process as disclosed in U.S. Pat. No. 5,382,619 and U.S. Pat. No. 5,457,739. For example, platinum electrodes are used as a cathode and a graphite body as an anode in an electrolytic cell. The resistance of the electrodes is specifically adjusted by changing the electrode spacing in the cell. In view of the great interest in the public to micro fuel cells in vehicles such as electric buses and electric cars, and also for space heating in buildings, there is a considerable interest in the development of further thin-film resistors for resistive heating elements. In this case, resistors which have a very high power density are required. According to the conventional method, the heating element is constructed of a mixture of finely divided graphite and metal particles as disclosed in U.S. Pat. No. 3,503,098. Such graphite resist
