The participant comments were generally negative about unsegmented subtitles. They were generally positive about grammatically segmented subtitles, generated either by professionals, or SubtitleFormatter program, on both on small and large displays. When the participants had different comments between large and small displays, they said that the lines or words were too hard to see on small displays. On large displays, they said the lines were not complete, or that they did not like it and could not explain why. It will be useful to know whether a viewer will read a standard-sized presentation on a standard screen (4:3), and also what quality standards are required for the subtitles to be read by a far less number of viewers, as in the case of personal devices. Without pre-formatting subtitles for the screen size and resolution, there is no way for a subtitle producer to know whether the subtitles will work as desired. The television formats are now changing and not all devices are 4:3. Television screen proportions may even vary based on resolution, and there is no guarantee that the ratio will remain 4:3 on all screens. On small non-interactive screens, the screen proportion may be different than the television, and it would be useful to know how to segment a subtitle for such a device. The evidence that viewers can read differently sized subtitles on different types of displays is a result that should have special significance to subtitling professionals. Knowing that viewers can now read different sized subtitles on different types of screens is vital knowledge for subtitle producers who work with different types of displays and viewers. This is the first demonstration of a critical difference in how the same subtitles look and appear to viewers on different types of displays. These results also provide a reminder that the size of the screen is not the only factor that will impact the appearance of subtitles on a screen. Until now, subtitling standards have been developed around the concept of a given screen that uses a given aspect ratio to display the video program. These standards should now be revised for a wider audience, and also for devices with unknown screen proportions.

The standard for the sizes of subtitles, and aspect ratios of the video frames have not changed for over 30 years. For example, the aspect ratio of NTSC 720 by 480 is 4:3 and the aspect ratio of PAL 720 by 576 is 4:3. These resolutions are controlled by the standards of the television broadcast service. Human rights and accessibility laws in some countries such as the United States and France, in addition to other laws set at the government level, require that video programming be captioned [ 2 ]. Accessibility laws in India and Brazil include a requirement that all television programs should include captions in the original language, and subtitles in the language of the country of origin (e.g., Portuguese for Brazilian programs). In the United States, copyright regulations require the inclusion of closed captioning in a variety of formats, but some types of programming do not meet legal requirements for closed captioning. Subtitling is legally required for all educational television programming and some of media programming, such as news and sports events. Additionally, many broadcast television programs include closed captioning as a sort of "opt-in" or "opt-out" option. Civil rights laws and disability access laws also prohibit discrimination and require that if content has accessible captions, they be presented in a clear and audible format [ 2 ]. The results showing that the participants performed better on the unsegmented subtitles were statistically significant for both more and less experienced subtitles. This suggests that the effects of segmentation may need to be examined further for children who have more exposure to subtitles, especially for smaller screens. It is not yet clear if other subgroups of children, such as those who are more likely to have hearing and vision deficits or autism spectrum disorder, would also benefit from un-segmented subtitles. There is also not enough data to establish if segmented subtitles would be more effective for other screen resolutions or aspect ratios other than 4:3. 5ec8ef588b
