
Spyder 5 Elite Serial 352 _BEST_

the factory sport mode had a tendency to always overdrive the monitor, giving it a yellow tint in the most extreme cases. a driver can lower rgb levels for a very 'vintage' look and preserve the true character of the film. this is great for games, which are naturally darker, but if you want a more sedate photo or video, you can preserve the display and find better calibration settings on the menu. the spyder elite's overdrive method is the 'sum of the flat horizontal and vertical gamma curves'. this means that the gamma curve is overlaid onto the gamma curve to create an overdrive curve. it starts at 1.5 times the led average, then drops as a function of gamma (the slope of the curve is 1.2, so the overdrive function begins at 7.5 times the led average). the monitor is able to produce a very accurate picture at 1.5 times the led average, but only at the cost of generating a very video-like picture. you will notice that anything approaching a true color will result in the monitor becoming very hot, and the backlight and pwm circuitry will get very noisy. the spyder elite is a comprehensive display calibration tool, and while it is very accurate at 1.5 times the led average, we found the overdrive was more noticeable when used at 1.75 times the led average. it does give the desired uniformity and color accuracy across the panel at 1.5 times the led average, though. at 1.75 times the led average, you can get away with using the default settings on the menu, and the monitor will look really good with very little tweaking. what about its color performance? when compared to other monitors, a native contrast of about 5000:1 is typical. according to the spyder elite utility, measurements were taken with adaptive brightness, game mode, rgb default and usb restricted adjusted.
