this game is a welcome change from games that look more like a dress-up game. it's sort of like painting in a sandbox. even better, paint brushes are totally destructible. furthermore, all the characters and items are modeled in 3d as opposed to being 2d sprites like in most current games. this game's great concept will become even more intriguing with all the cool new features that it gains upon post-launch updates. the demo runs pretty well in direct and windowed mode. the game does look a bit like front mission, and perhaps even more like a third-person battlefield. although in that case the similarities would go much further than in this case. the game is heavy on the overhead view and most of the time in that view will be most effective for playing the game. the demo had a fair level of polish to it and i was very impressed with the graphics. if the game were released with more features and levels, i think it could be well worth a play or two. that being said, there was more of a grand theft auto vibe to this demo than to something like wing commander. i am sure even the most diehard van damme fans will appreciate the look of the van damme game. not only is van damme rendered using a higher resolution than the newer character models in the game, but also, his animations are done with fewer frames than in the movie scenes. the modern van damme game looks to be a lot of fun as it provides gamers and fanatics a high quality action game. it is fun to paint van damme's face, and use the van damme character as a weapon to destroy the enemies' vehicles.
