the dod already uses a wide variety of software licensed under the gpl. a 2003 mitre study, use of free and open source software (foss) in the u.s. department of defense, identified many oss programs that the dod is already using that are licensed under the gpl. these included the linux kernel, the gcc compilation suite (including the gnat ada compiler), the openoffice.org office suite, the emacs text editor, the nmap network scanner, openssh and openssh for encryption, and samba for unix/linux/windows interoperability. this should not be surprising; the dod uses oss extensively, and the gpl is the most popular oss license. total cost-of-ownership is always important to consider when selecting a license. the conclusion is often that the cost of the license has little effect on how the software is used. there are often commercial alternatives that will do everything the license-restricted software can do at a lower price (and may use the proprietary software for things it cannot do), and often the same software is available under multiple licenses. when licenses are restricted, the software is usually bundled with the license (as is often the case with proprietary software licenses), which means there is a non-zero transaction cost for the user to obtain it. however, this cost is usually either small, or is made up for by lower user costs (licensing is often relatively straightforward). in the case of gpl software, the gnu general public license stipulates that the software must be completely free; this means that when a piece of software is obtained under gpl, it is obtained free of charge.
