
Forced Human Toilet Stories !!TOP!!

it's a fact: the toilet is the dirtiest room in the house. it is here that dirty water and "stuff" go. it's a room that is rarely cleaned and is one of the most-hated rooms in the home. this is a room where the toilet is most-likely to be used but least likely to be cleaned by the homeowner, and therefore, the room that is most likely to accumulate "stuff". on the other hand, the toilet bowl is a room that is often cleaned by a maid, but then, often times the toilet pan is left to sit in the same "stuff" that is in the toilet bowl. pants: what's worn under your clothes is a closet full of cleaning products. every day it is collected and stored for future use. many people will get excited about the idea of cleaning the toilet. some will get it cleaned once a week, others will get it cleaned once a month, and still others will get it cleaned once a year. but even the best of us know that cleaning our toilet is a boring chore. in fact, studies have shown that the most of us clean the toilet once a month. also, a third of us have never cleaned our toilet at all. and even the people who clean their toilets once a week, only clean the toilet bowl and toilet seat -- leaving the toilet pan untouched. unfortunately, this is not something that should be left for the cleaning maid. in fact, this is not something that should be left for the maid at all. you could call this a maintenance issue, a plumbing issue, or a repair issue. but i call it a human waste issue. the toilet in the bathroom of the house that i rent has been the scene of many an interesting moment for our four children. one morning, they heard a loud "plop, plop, plop" coming from the toilet. they decided to investigate and the toilet was filled with water. they pulled out a full-grown snake (you wouldn't believe the size of these things.) they got it out and put it outside. i got the contract out of them that they were never to put another animal in that toilet. they got to keep the snake. there were mice in the toilet that were also too big for them to get out. they ended up killing them and using them in a science project. my daughter went to a music concert with some friends of hers. one of her friends was a normal size girl. when she got to the concert, she was crying because she was so scared that there would be a girl sitting next to her and that girl would be so big that she would be forced to sit on the toilet.

although lawns and gardens are wonderful places to sit, they can also be the source of unwanted odors and contaminants. for example, if a car drives over wet grass, the water and dirt on it may soak through into the lawn, creating a puddle. without proper irrigation equipment, this water may go straight into the garden's root systems creating a problem for your plants. another common source of indoor odors is smoking. some of the world's worst air contains toxic substances from cigarettes. unless the smoker is in a ventilated area or area of open windows, you may not be able to tell whether a home is a healthy one or one that suffers from air pollution. another way to help improve indoor air quality and extend the life of home furnishings is to regularly clean your home's ventilation systems. in most cases, homes have systems that run automatically in the evening and on weekends that do the outside cleaning for you. in homes with forced air heating and cooling, you can often allow the ventilation systems to run during the day as well as when the air conditioner runs and the furnace runs so that they can thoroughly clean the home's air. indoor pollutants can also find their way into homes via cracks and crevices. cracks that are prone to weather damage, such as those around exterior window and doorframes and in attic spaces, may be allowing water, dampness, and contaminants to seep in and cause humidity-related problems. also, keeping your home well-ventilated can be helpful to prevent building-related contaminants from getting into your home. 5ec8ef588b
