After linking a spot on an image & adjusting the spot's exposure/contrast/color values, I still have to apply the adjustment by using the modification bar. Doesn't that take too much fiddling with the Adjustment slider, when I could make a one-line adjustment with a single click? Especially considering the extreme slowness of the bars adjusting (the tiny adjustment is visible at a distance!). Intermediate cutting of a panorama image. One of the resulting files in a group have a problem with drawing of the text part. Supposed to be discarded, it makes it hard to print it out (not like the best quality ones you can buy already). True, you may have to spend some time in learning how to use them, but shape layers are extremely useful for manipulating your images. Whether you normalize the levels in the layers panel or adjust color masks to suit your needs, it's all about adjusting the masks, so the shapes will follow accordingly. You can also use the basic shapes to create a new shape, or even cut it into a new one. Layers are useful because they can be a three-dimensional stack of tools, which you can use to build and create something new. When you work with a hierarchy of layers, you can apply a layer mask, which is the way to mask off pixels without affecting the content on the layer beneath it. When you work with layer masks you can see what's happening underneath the covered parts of the screen. When you use shape layers or selections, it doesn't matter if you're positioned at the top or below the other layers.
