The ruling came in a case where a suspect under indictment for a 2007 bank robbery in San Diego was suspected of further crimes as a result of the digital investigation. The suspect has been charged with dozens of bank robberies, but his $10 million bounty also placed the case in the spotlight of what some call the "crypto-currency war." In December, a grand jury in San Diego indicted Randy S. Neal for stealing $2.7 million from two San Diego banks in early 2007, according to court documents. Investigators had suspected Neal, who had worked as an armored car driver, of further crimes as a result of a digital investigation of his computer. Neal was arrested and charged with bank robbery. An FBI agent seized his computers. At that point, the agency turned the case over to the U.S. Secret Service, which began looking at Neal's encrypted email account. Neal was subsequently indicted on charges of possessing stolen property, making false statements and receiving stolen property. The former armored car driver is being held on $1 million bond. Neal's attorney David F. Abney has argued that searching his client's computers violated the Fourth Amendment. In a recent court filing, Neal's lawyer pointed out that the court had authorized the Secret Service to wiretap Neal in 2008. "Although the court may have previously authorized a wiretap, it cannot authorize the same wiretap against the same defendant," Abney wrote. "This was
