The execution threads represent complex computation tasks performed by distributed computing systems. The resources represent the distributed computing infrastructure that can be used to execute the execution threads. Execution threads are submitted by users that want their processing task to be executed by the distributed computing system. Resources are allocated to execution threads based on the execution time requirements of the tasks. The running cost of any distributed computing system is driven by the cost of allocating resources. Therefore, the time required to locate execution threads in the distributed computing system can impact on the cost of running the system. The state of the art for locating execution threads is through a contention scheme. In a contention scheme, the available resources are divided into execution threads. Each resource has a weight. Resources are arranged in a linear list according to their weight values. Resources are allocated to execution threads in accordance with the order the execution threads are placed in the list. The first execution thread in the list is assigned to the first resource. The second execution thread in the list is assigned to the next available resource. The location of execution threads may be further refined by reallocating threads to the most optimal resource. In effect, the cost of locating the execution threads can be calculated. Locating execution threads in a distributed computing system can also be modeled as a search problem. We define a search space to be a subset of resources. A search algorithm that improves the location of execution threads can be modeled as a heuristic. The goal of a heuristic search algorithm is to use limited computing resources to locate execution threads that are close to the optimal location, whilst attempting to avoid the search space. The time complexity of a search algorithm is directly related to the quality of the solution. A poor quality solution, that locates execution
