Inhaled corticosteroids are the mainstay of asthma therapy, but approximately one third of patients fail to achieve and maintain the asthma control goal despite treatment. The overall efficacy of inhaled corticosteroids may be impaired by a lack of timely initiation of treatment and by poor compliance to maintenance therapy. Asthma control status in patients initiating treatment with inhaled corticosteroids was assessed at day 14 in the six-month, randomized ACTS trial, a multicentre, open-label trial in 3,235 patients with symptomatic asthma, as part of the day 14 and day 1 assessment. Patients were randomized to initial treatment with either a low- or high-dose inhaled corticosteroid (budesonide or beclomethasone) in a 1:1 ratio. Study outcomes included mean change from baseline in daily symptoms and medication use at day 14 and 24 and rescue medication use at day 14. At day 14, no statistically significant differences were seen in response to treatment. In the intention-to-treat (ITT) population, mean change from baseline in daily symptoms (ACT score) was significantly greater in patients randomized to a high-dose than low-dose inhaled corticosteroid (1.4 vs. -0.1; p < 0.001), and rescue medication use was also significantly higher in this group (p =0.002). However, only 16% of patients had achieved an asthma control status of "well-controlled" at day 14, and even fewer (8%) had a status of "partly controlled" or "uncontrolled." Poor compliance to medication and patient forgetfulness were significant factors influencing treatment outcome f988f36e3a
