Its presentation varies from serious to picaresque, and its ambivalence is particularly ambivalent. Aspects of these various meanings include: the use of the elements in the composition itself, the use of typography in advertising, the use of typography as a form of persuasion, the ethics of typographic design practices, typographic writing as an academic practice, and as a form of fiction. This seminar will review the most relevant historiographic and theoretical debates and provide a critique of typographic knowledge in critical and creative writing practices, emphasizing an analysis of American and Australian Script writing practices. In particular, we will ask major questions on the typographic writing practices as they apply to the semiotics of intellectual and artistic justice, and on the specific theoretical challenges for the form.
