IAF also supports layered and bitmap images. Images are selected and options are set directly from the layer or image toolbar. IAF also supports powerful control over retouching and the width of the canvas directly in the edit bin. IAF also supports layer selection (quickly and efficiently), merge, quick selection, smart select and smart clone. It can also convert between formats. The UI keeps a design intent consistent when scale and rotation are applied in an image. The file dialog and shortcuts are consistent and intuitive throughout the application. You can edit the keyframe position, size and speed directly in the timeline, or, in certain cases, set properties in the keyframes using a graphical keyframe editor. This is similar to the position and rotation properties of the Image Selector Bar in Photoshop CS4, but there's no comparable Tilda feature in version CS5. Photoshop CS5 public beta 2 is a checkerboard-flat update in which most of the earlier features remain. Unfortunately, the top toolbar—the one with the icons for View, Zoom, Edit, Layer and Scene panels—makes its appearance at only 50% opacity. You still get icons for Brushes, Canvas, History, Styles, Layers and Effects, but there are no icons for Panels and most of Photoshop's other features—Quick Selection, Quick Mask, Actions, Type, Paths, Effects, Export, Warp or Grid. We have all the new features and improvements that we could want for CS5, but it's not there because it can't be delivered in a beta release. Adobe may not be releasing beta updates for CS3 anymore. What's the point in upgrading from CS4? CS5 isn't even worth it? I have no idea. Over the past year or so, no one has been paying much attention to Photoshop. You can't find anything on the Photoshop site related to CS5 or the recent beta 2. Is Adobe hopelessly stuck in the past?
