First of all, let's talk about the application itself. It's possible I don't know what this application is capable of. In some way I've been there - I thought I knew what tools can be used in this program, but new functions and working processes unleashed by this update have ended up making me say, "I can create cool things with this software that I'd never think of doing! I feel excited." I don't say that just to oversell this product. I just feed off that feeling, which is why I'm excited to use this program. You can set the software to automatically execute it's features the moment you open the application. Every time you start it up, you save a little bit of time - the moment you open up your camera, you can import images without having to do a thing and process them, so that you have the final product once you're done working with your images. If you start a new project, you can use your images without saving anything first. Here is the disadvantage. Once that project ends, all the images you've worked on disappear. So, you'll have to import them again, but you'll have a few minutes more time in every session you open the application. This is the best solution if you start a lot of portraits, for instance. You have some time already to work on them. When you're done, you can export your images as JPEGs with all the adjustments and settings you've added, but only for the same project you used for saving. If not, either through the app or otherwise, everything gets lost.
